

CHAPTER V

CONCLUSION AND SUGGESTION

A. Conclusion

In this chapter, the writer finally makes a conclusion based on references contained in the previous chapter that address terms in six kinds. After analyzing and discussing data usage of address terms as a topic in the previous chapter, it has been concluded in some conclusion which based on the data study as follow:

1. The study of this theme helps us to know how to address different kinds of people. This key needs not only to understand the rules but also the taking relevant factors into consideration. A thorough study and good mastery of address forms are necessary for intercultural communication.
2. Address terms are also one of the important language components because in these address terms it can be found that certain interactions will continue. There are two types of greeting words, kinship and non-kinship. The factors that influence the differences are differences in relatives, age differences, position differences, situation differences, and differences in social status, kinship relations and the purpose of the speaker.

B. Suggestion

After getting the result of the research, the writer provides some suggestions for future writer who want to conduct research like this. These suggestions include:

1. For literature students who want to research greeting terms, it is recommended to look for data that has the type of conversation in various locations. So that, this research includes many greetings that affect social factors.
2. In this study, the authors found data on address terms based on kinship or nicknames as The Fault in Our Stars is a romantic film. The writer knows how to greet someone in a different environment and it turns out that the element of calling someone is determined by various factors.
